Allman was born in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1946. He began playing guitar at the age of 11, and by his late teens, he was already a skilled musician. In 1968, he co-founded the Allman Brothers Band with his brother Gregg. The band's debut album, "The Allman Brothers Band," was released in 1969 and was a critical and commercial success.

Allman's guitar playing was characterized by its fluidity, emotion, and improvisation. He was a master of slide guitar, and his solos were often both technically dazzling and deeply soulful. He was also a gifted songwriter, and he penned some of the Allman Brothers Band's most enduring hits, including "Whipping Post" and "Ramblin' Man."

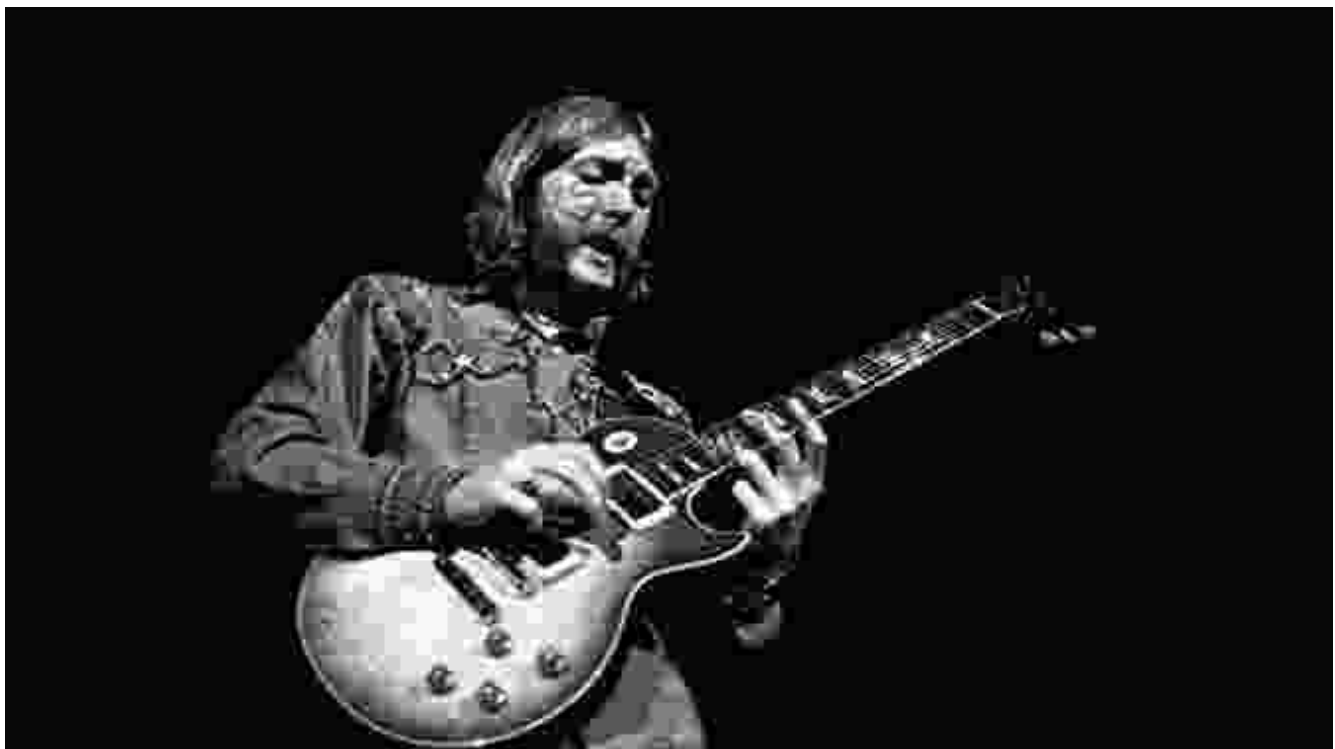

Allman died in a motorcycle accident in 1971, at the age of 24. His death was a tragic loss for the music world, and he is still considered one of the greatest guitarists of all time.
